The 1958 NFL Championship Game was a watershed moment in the history of American football. The game, which was played between the Baltimore Colts and the New York Giants, introduced a number of innovations that would revolutionize the sport.

One of the most significant innovations was the use of the two-point conversion. Prior to the 1958 season, teams were only able to score one point after a touchdown. The two-point conversion gave teams the opportunity to score two points after a touchdown, which made it more difficult for teams to tie or win games.

Another major innovation was the AFL's first national television contract. The AFL, which was a rival league to the NFL, had been struggling to gain a foothold in the United States. The television contract gave the AFL a national platform to showcase its games, which helped to increase the league's popularity.

The 1958 NFL Championship Game also marked the first time that the Super Bowl was played. The Super Bowl is now the most watched sporting event in the United States, and it has helped to make football one of the most popular sports in the world.
